

The following picture is a composite of a million squares. Each one has been lightened or darkened according to the number of galaxies within it. Where there is black, there are no galaxies or less than ten;

where there is light, there are ten or more of them. This map shows the galaxies to be arranged in clustered filaments, scattered across the sky. Each of the ten galaxies contains millions or billions of stars.

